Theme:

Saussure said that language is a system of signs. Every text that we encounter, literary and otherwise, has its narrative structures – structures that play a major role in its experience and interpretation. The word 'performative' can be understood to mean both the aesthetic conventions and generic codes in a narrative that constitute meanings as well as is used to refer to certain types of narratives that have been associated with performing in front of an audience.

While all texts contain a performative element in the first sense, this webinar seeks to engage with, through analysis and study, texts belonging to genres that are associated with 'performance.' The idea of performance that marks such texts imply the simultaneous presence of the performer(s) and the audience at the site of performance.

Over the course of the keynote address, panel discussion and paper presentations, it aims to engage with and raise discussions around the aesthetic and thematic aspects of such forms. The paper presentations will analyse dance, music, folk, dramatic and visual texts from varying perspectives and aspects of 'performance'
